

modestly studies and preserves in eternal "presents," and presents to us as delightful gifts (the third sense of "presents"). The paradox is that the film is most personal in the section in which the artist does not intrude. He shows himself most profoundly when he shares what he sees. So this, the third section, is so much weightier and more moving than the illusionist cinema which he satirizes in the earlier comic episodes. The first two episodes are enclosing and false. The third is an exhilarating exercise in opening out.

The third part is a collage of apparent objectivity. Neither heard nor seen, Snow is present only by his implicit functions of choice of material, filming and editing. But the world we see there is very much Snow's world. The section abounds with characteristic Snow shots - dizzying pans back and forth, and waves, and birds, and walking women. And a beaming Joyce Wieland hard upon (well, really soft) a shot of a happy family celebration. Not just the world opens out in that third section, but the private Snow as well.

The first part is accompanied by a modulating electronic drone, that seems to harmonize as the image comes into focus. In contrast, the sound in the second part is rooted in the setting, both in the character's room and in the director's operation. In the third part the sound works ambiguously between the synchronous and the imposed. Each cut is accompanied by a drumtap, like a pulse. We can't determine whether this tap causes, announces, or reacts to the change in image. That is the very ambiguity of the filmmaker's relationship to his image here. He is a present recorder. He is at once passive before the spectacle and active in its preservation.

For all its import, though, one must not lose sight of the sheer pleasure that this film presents. It's not often that one feels regret when a Michael Snow film comes to its end. But here one is disappointed when that brilliantly executed slapstick sequence is over. And even more when his collage of splendid reality draws to a close. But then the quickening drum-pulse heralds our return to the world beyond the screen. There we can exercise the sharper, appreciative eye for color and movement that Snow has primed. There his Presents will enhance our own present.

Maurice Yacowar ●

PRESENTS d./p./cam./ed./sets Michael Snow ed. John Kamenaar, Bill Buxton, Brian Day cam. Keith Lock p. man. Robin Collyer l.p. Jane Fellowes, Peter Melnick colour 16 mm year 1980 (with the assistance of the Canada Council) running time 90 min. dist. Canadian Filmmaker's Distribution Centre.

● A glimpse of Presents.

Vic Sarin's You've Come a Long Way, Katie

Social problems frequently serve as good television fodder. They tend to provoke strong audience reaction, which consequently improves ratings. In the past, such diverse topics as venereal disease, male prostitution and child beating have been tackled with varying degrees of success. Now, You've Come a Long Way, Katie treats the subject of cross-addiction. This recent CBC mini-series of three, one-hour episodes, is a serious docu-drama as well as good entertainment; the subject matter has been handled with intelligence and good taste.

Cross-addiction is an addictive dependence on alcohol and tranquilizers to relieve daily stress - a by-product of our push-and-shove society. It's more prevalent in major cities, and seems to prey more frequently on women than men, as shown by a recent Alcoholics Anonymous survey of its members' - indicating that more than half are women - and a study by the Canadian Psychiatric Association stating that one Canadian woman in five consumes excessive mood-altering drugs. Mixed together, booze and drugs are a scary combination.

You've Come a Long Way, Katie grapples with cross-addiction factually and dramatically; in much the same way as did the old Ray Milland classic, The Lost Weekend in 1945. Producer Jeannine Locke, veteran director of numerous documentaries, including To Die Today and Friends of Ireland, utilized a documentary approach to breathe life into her plot and characters. Locke spent several months researching cross-addiction before scripting episodes one and three of the series, turning over episode two to writer Jay Telfer, who was cross-addicted himself for ten years.

Kate Forbes (Lally Cadeau) is the sparkling host of the popular daytime show, "Straight Talk." In episode one, Madder Music, we see the beginnings of her downfall from stability, the result of marital problems and heavy job stress. Kate has trouble coping with her problems and seeks a solution in alcohol. When drinking fails to provide the extra lift she requires, the booze is supplemented by healthy doses of Valium. "This is shaping up to be a three-Valium show!" she chortles before one difficult taping.

Eventually, Katie is physically and emotionally impaired to the point where Virginia, her producer (Irene Mayeska), issues an ultimatum: she must seek help or be fired. Rather than lose her job, Katie decides to spend a month at the Brentcliffe Clinic, and it is here that the second episode, A Month On The Moon, unravels.

During her stay at the clinic, Katie undergoes a comprehensive therapy program of exercise, group therapy, anti-booze pills and psychological counselling. With the help of fellow patients, doctors and nurses, and Stuart (Booth Savage), the new man in her life, Katie seeks and finds solutions to the problems that have gripped her. Consequently, she leaves the clinic with high expectations.

Episode three, The Bottom Line, sees Katie back at her hosting duties, and bored by it all. Realizing a change of scenery is in order, she decides to try for a position on a top nightly news show, and fervently sets to work on her audition piece for the screen test. However, she fails to impress the show's producers and loses her chance for the job. Katie's first impulse is to have a drink, to calm her nerves, and locked up in the darkness of her apartment, she turns to Canadian Club and Valium for moral support. The end result is tragic.

● Victim of a lethal mixture, CBC's "golden girl" Lally Cadeau as Katie Forbes in You've Come a Long Way, Katie.

Despite its sometimes soap-operish qualities, this drama works well on the screen, due mostly to the talents of Lally Cadeau as the doomed Katie. After a fair number of television commercials and variety shows, Cadeau has recently become the golden girl of the CBC, and star of their weekly sitcom, Hangin' In. She possesses the ability to change mood at a moment's notice when playing Katie, and uses humour well in portraying the cross-addicted heroine, a role requiring great skill.

Ken James, as Katie's friend Lee, turns in a similarly powerful performance, and is backed up in his efforts by a fine supporting cast, including Catherine O'Hara (formerly of Second City) as the cross-addicted Chris, and Larry Solway as egocentric anchorman Dave Richards.

Despite the cast's fine acting and a competent script, this production occasionally falls prey to the same illness that seems to have crippled many similar American productions - the undying desire to make a social statement. At several points during the show, Telfer and Locke forget they are telling a story and begin to preach. This is most obvious in the second episode, which seems more like a training film for doctors intent on specializing in clinical cross-addiction treatment, than an entertainment for the average TV viewer.

Despite this, You've Come a Long Way, Katie manages to hold our attention, and keep it; not an easy thing to do in this fickle modern society of video recorders and push-button converters. For this, credit must go to the writers; for Katie's plight is compelling enough to warrant us watching her for three successive nights. And it is time well spent.

The camerawork and direction are superb, thanks to the talents of Vic Sarin and his cameramen, Neville Ottey and Dave Towers. They accomplish much in the way of realism by using a documentary style in their shots to bring the events to life.

As first-rate drama You've Come a Long Way, Katie is a fine example of just how far the Canadian film industry has come. Lloyd Wasser ●

YOU'VE COME A LONG WAY, KATIE d. Vic Sarin p. Jeannine Locke sc. Jeannine Locke, Jay Telfer d.o.p. Vic Sarin a.d. Michael Zenon (1st), Allan Harmon (2nd), John Rainy cont. Carl Fisher p. sec. Vicki Ohashi cam. Neville Ottey, Dave Towers sd. Dave Brown unit man. Dwight Gallinger boom Ian Challis lighting Ian Gibson des. Paul Ames cost. Stevie Calder, Selma Garten, Christopher Drake make-up Daisy Bijac, Gerry Wraith des. co-ord. Bob Powers set dec. Stephen Finnie sp. efx. Arne Boye casting Gail Carr, Annika McLachlan post-p. Toni Mori p. co-ord. Duncan Lamb asst. p. co-ord. Janet Kranz l.p. Lally Cadeau, Irene Mayeska, Tim Henry, Booth Savage, Norma Renault, Edward Greenhalgh, Don Scanlon, Catherine O'Hara, Ken James, Douglas Campbell, Dean Regan, Dinah Christie, Sean Sullivan, Norman Campbell, Murray Westgate, Larry Solway p.c. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (1980) running time 3 one-hour episodes col. 16 mm.