SHORTS

Paul Mason's

Dragoncastle

Dragoncastle is a claymation (plasticine animation) short. It won first prize for animation, the Chris Statuette, at the Columbus International Film Festival. It has also been a finalist in several other festivals, including the Canadian Film and Television Awards. Although Dragoncastle is ostensibly "an animation film for kids, made by kids," intended for kindergarten through grades three or four, it has a much broader appeal.

The story is as simple as it is imaginative. It takes place in a strange, ecologically balanced kingdom. A Disneyesque site fairy tale characters: the king, the knaves quickly break out of their stock and the townspeople. Yet these protagonists two years, who naively and delightedly pretty well to the point and another of individuals.

Something must be done. The king, who comes from afar to rid the kingdom of this dread beast. The dragon is not agrees, and sends for the white knight. The action is narrated by two young children, one of which is a whitish, hot air, agrees to leave his castle, is accused of incinerating the village. As if this weren't enough, with the rampage, destroying much of the balance of the entire kingdom has been drastically disrupted, until it's too late. The balance is once again restored. The villagers rebuild their town and tend their gardens. The dragon is in his cage. Peace on earth.

Although Dragoncastle will be marketed as an educational film, it was not originally intended as such by those who conceived it. Becky and Paul Mason began working on Dragoncastle at the ages of 11 and 13, respectively, after receiving several plasticine as a Christmas present. They built a castle for fun, and also, just for fun, decided to try a few seconds of animation. Their father, Bill Mason, an award-winning NFB director, helped them with the more technical aspects. Five years later Dragoncastle was in the can. Technically, the film is very accomplished. The animation is alive and believable, with great attention paid to often humorous detail. The editing is well-paced and there is a good variety of camera angles. The monsters and humans have distinct, endearing personalities. Remarkably, there are no "bad guys and good guys."

Becky and Paul began playing with the plasticine castle in the living room of their home. As the set grew, and the two began to take their game more seriously, their father allowed them to move into his studio. Yet the living room floor is never really abandoned. The film is never pedantic or moralistic. The fun of a child's game on the floor is preserved.

The original score is by Andrew Huggett. The string ensemble playing "early renaissance" music provides a sophisticated backdrop or the characters. The two young narrators play the distance between the childish comments and the adult music is teasing and playful. The music remains a distance between the adolescents who began the film and the young adults who completed it five years later, between the game on the floor and the work in the studio. These distances animate the animation and charm the viewer, whether he is a child, or simply a child at heart.

Jeffrey Reid

LETTERS

The ad got the results intended; no one forgot it, and the Cannes coverage, as you can see, is super. Just a note about the ad being sexist.

Jeffrey Reid

Once more the king is petitioned by the villagers. The knight is sent for, commanded to find the dragon and "politely" ask him to return. The knight swallows his pride and rides off on his charger. He finds the sulky dragon who, after a bit of hot air, agrees to leave his desolate cave and return to the kingdom, where he receives a hero's welcome. He quickly dispatches the monsters to their most, reclaims his cave, and begins heating the cold, damp castle above. The balance is once again restored. The villains rebuild their town and tend their gardens. The dragon is in his cage. Peace on earth.

David Fine's

Viola

David Fine's new short Viola conveys the feeling of hands - out exploration, a young director trying on an attitude for size. In this case, the attitude is rudimentary aesthetics: it is a lovely film to look at, bold in no way, but still lovely and simple and full of life.

The viola itself is shown as an object of obvious sculptural beauty, and Fine has been lucky in his chance to work with Mark Irwin, whose camera work here is so lush and epicurean. We are shown the making of the instrument in detail, and Otto Erdesz's especially sensual approach to his craft. His attitude towards the creation of the instrument envelops it for the viewer. At the end of the film, the craftsman's wife/musician, Rivka Golani-Erdesz, plays the viola with intensity that both touches and holds the audience. Fine and Irwin have managed to sustain the emotion and the integrity of the subject matter in document. If at times this film reads like the classic "artist's film" (step back and see Moore and his bones), on this level it is true to its subject matter, which is existing in itself.

In the past Fine has worked primarily in animation. His short films have picked up a number of awards in various competitions, in the student division. Live action is a new direction for him and Viola is a respectable effort. With greater experience and confidence in his abilities, Fine may allow more of that imagination of his earlier work to come more show through - something we can look forward to.

Katherine Dolgy

Good and disgusting

The new format prompts me to write a long-delayed note of appreciation. I think the magazine is making a very important contribution to our cultural growth and to the representation of that growth both at home and abroad. This last number has been really fine. The only thing that gives me a funny feeling is the description of your selves in the masthead as a "charitable organization" and, of course, "the making of the instrument," and the viola is being reasonable.

Dan Driscoll

P.E.I. District Representative, National Film Board

The Cinema Canada Magazine Foundation is indeed a charitable organization, and donations are accepted with thanks. Ed.

Count me out

Regarding the ad for Cinema Canada's "coverage at Cannes." Congratulations. It's sexist, exploitative and very American, in the fashion of Penthouse and Playboy. I am very happy with your new image. If I had a subscription, I'd cancel it.

Sharon Thomson

Vancouver

"Technically, the film is very accomplished. The animation is alive and believable, with great attention paid to often humorous detail. The editing is well-paced and there is a good variety of camera angles. The monsters and humans have distinct, endearing personalities. Remarkably, there are no "bad guys and good guys."

Becky and Paul began playing with the plasticine castle in the living room of their home. As the set grew, and the two began to take their game more seriously, their father allowed them to move into his studio. Yet the living room floor is never really abandoned. The film is never pedantic or moralistic. The fun of a child's game on the floor is preserved.

The original score is by Andrew Huggett. The string ensemble playing "early renaissance" music provides a sophisticated backdrop or the characters. The two young narrators play the distance between the childish comments and the adult music is teasing and playful. The music remains a distance between the adolescents who began the film and the young adults who completed it five years later, between the game on the floor and the work in the studio. These distances animate the animation and charm the viewer, whether he is a child, or simply a child at heart.

Jeffrey Reid

DRAGONCASTLE p. 4. Paul Mason p. Bill Mason animators Paul &. Becky Mason orig. score Andrew Huggett. 15 sec running time 13 min. dist. National Film Board. 1975

ON CULTURE: MALE VS. FEMALE p. 37

Score one for culture

Appearance of the new format prompts me to write a long-delayed note of appreciation. I think the magazine is making a very important contribution to our cultural growth and to the representation of that growth both at home and abroad. This last number has been really fine. The only thing that gives me a funny feeling is the description of your selves in the masthead as a "charitable organization" and, of course, "the making of the instrument," and the viola is being reasonable.

Dan Driscoll

P.E.I. District Representative, National Film Board

The Cinema Canada Magazine Foundation is indeed a charitable organization, and donations are accepted with thanks. Ed.

Count me out

Regarding the ad for Cinema Canada's "coverage at Cannes." Congratulations. It's sexist, exploitative and very American, in the fashion of Penthouse and Playboy. I am very happy with your new image. If I had a subscription, I'd cancel it.

Sharon Thomson

Vancouver

LETTERS

The choice of the cover photo was made by Beryl Fox, the producer of By Design. We endorse her choice and expect Claudia Jutras's film to be neither cheap nor exploitative.