Tom Radford's

China Mission: The Chester Ronning Story

In small white house, in a small white town in Alberta, lives a great man. Here, Chester Ronning - statesman, missionary, schoolteacher, cowboy - is at home. Ronning lives famously in the agricultural community of Camrose, in the shadow of China. His life's work done, he languishes quietly, like an old cowboy in a hotel lobby, offering inspiration and comfort to anyone who happens by.

In 1980, the National Film Board's production studio in Edmonton released an hour-long documentary entitled China Mission: The Chester Ronning Story. The film introduced this outstanding Canadian to most ordinary Canadians.

China Mission was directed by Tom Radford who also acted as co-writer with the late, legendary Stanley Jackson. Radford's task was unenviable: describing the enormity and variety of Ronning's life experiences. China Mission, in order to succeed, had to take a century of tumultuous history and put it on two reels.

Chester Ronning was born in 1894, in the ancient walled city of Fancheng. He was the first non-Chinese to be born there. His parents, Lutheran missionaries, were quick to adopt the local culture. Young Chester grew up speaking Chinese as a first language. Norwegian as a second and English a poor third. He was fed from the breast of a Chinese milkmaid and in every way, except appearance, was your average kid on the block.

This was the boy who would be Canada's first ambassador to Peking, High Commissioner to India and Special U.S. negotiator in North Vietnam. He would also become a founder of the CCF (Commonwealth Cooperative Federation) and a prophetic voice on the side of China and Mao Tse Tung.

RONNING and his family were forced to flee China. In 1939, with the advent of the Boxer Rebellion. They returned in 1901 and stayed for six more years until Ronning's mother Hannah died of illness.

Ronning returned to Canada where he became a homesteader in the Peace River country of northern Alberta. There he worked as a cowboy, enroute to his birthplace in Fancheng and his mother's grave. In scene after scene, we see a man who was loved by children and animals and suspected by politicians. What would you prefer? The fact that Ronning was a western teacher and not an eastern historian did nothing for his diplomatic career. It's also the reason why he remains mostly unknown in sophisticated, video-wise areas like southern Alberta.

The film, in style, is a fairly straightforward documentary. It combines contemporary footage with archival footage and stills, intercut with interviews. These elements are welded together by Cedric Smith's narration and Roger Deegan's music.

There's nothing flashy here, nothing gimmicky, just the story of a great man told in an excellent film.

China Mission is not so much about China as it is about one man's vision of it. Radford uses Ronning as a key to unlock some of the myriad mysteries which cocoon that awesome country. He never tries to tell the history of modern China in 58 minutes which is just as well. For this reason, Chester Ronning has never been totally happy with the film. He feels it focuses too much on him and not enough on the evolution of today's China. This is a criticism which I'm sure Radford can live with.

This project first surfaced six years ago when Radford was hot to make "The Chester Ronning Story." He soon found out that Ronning's daughter, Audrey Topping, a photo-journalist with the New York Times, had the same idea.

Given the pecuniary order, Radford decided to take a back seat. Two years later, when the Topping film had not materialized, Radford renewed his interest in the project and received Ronning's blessing.

In 1971, Ronning returned to China at the invitation of his old friend Chou En Lai. He journeyed back up river to his birthplace in Fancheng and his mother's grave. Topping followed with her movie camera. Her footage was to become the end and the beginning of Radford's film. Through the National Film Board, Radford obtained rights to the Topping footage and at last he had something to work around.

China Mission then became a viable project with a $200,000 budget. Extensive research produced archival stills and footage of unparalleled quality, and the live action sequences were completed in Alberta and the state of Iowa.

This film works, and works well, because of the way it successfully shuffles so many different images. Much of the credit here has to go to editor and post-production supervisor, Christopher Tate, and the film's commitment to the film came from the fact that his mother was born in China, the daughter of a missionary, and many of the archival stills had come from his own family album. Tate's fine cut is a masterpiece of compromise. This film is undoubtedly too short and Radford is quick to agree. However, Tate's editing gives it the lyrical flow it requires to tell the story in a non-staccato fashion. Tate has already been honored with awards for his cutting of this film, which although difficult, must have been this editor's dream.

China Mission is a valuable filmic document which illuminates the life and work of a Canadian who understands and loves a quarter of the world's population.

I have long maintained that Canadian features are like wayward orphans in search of an identity. In contrast, Canadian documentaries are as tough as a pucks and this film is an appropriate example.

Aside to politics, China Mission has never been shown on national television in this country! There are probably many reasons for this, but a few deserve some scrutiny.

Could it be that the traditional rivalry between the NFB and the CBC is depriving Canadians of experiencing this inspired piece of work? Or perhaps the CTV is too interested in American sitcoms to find the time to air a documentary. In any case, it's a national disgrace that this film has yet to be shown on television.

Chester Ronning is an old man. His story may not be slick, sexy or sensational, but it is truly educational. What a wonderful day it would be when our networks could differentiate between the truths of the teacher and the temptations of the titulator.

Tom Crighton

In what must go down as one of the more infamous remarks made by buyers at the CBC to a producer, Tom Radford was told that, although the network was not at present interested in the film, it would be prepared to buy it for screening after Ronning's death.

CHINA MISSION: THE CHESTER RONNING STORY

The Story of a Canadian Missionary

This project first surfaced six years ago when Radford was hot to make "The Chester Ronning Story." He soon found out that Ronning's daughter, Audrey Topping, a photo-journalist with the New York Times, had the same idea.

Given the pecuniary order, Radford decided to take a back seat. Two years later, when the Topping film hadn't materialized, Radford renewed his interest in the project and received Ronning's blessing.

In 1971, Ronning returned to China at the invitation of his old friend Chou En Lai. He journeyed back up river to his birthplace in Fancheng and his mother's grave. Topping followed with her movie camera. Her footage was to become the end and the beginning of Radford's film. Through the National Film Board, Radford obtained rights to the Topping footage and at last he had something to work around.

China Mission then became a viable project with a $200,000 budget. Extensive research produced archival stills and footage of unparalleled quality, and the live action sequences were completed in Alberta and the state of Iowa.

This film works, and works well, because of the way it successfully shuffles so many different images. Much of the credit here has to go to editor and post-production supervisor, Christopher Tate, and the film's commitment to the film came from the fact that his mother was born in China, the daughter of a missionary, and many of the archival stills had come from his own family album. Tate's fine cut is a masterpiece of compromise. This film is undoubtedly too short and Radford is quick to agree. However, Tate's editing gives it the lyrical flow it requires to tell the story in a non-staccato fashion. Tate has already been honored with awards for his cutting of this film, which although difficult, must have been this editor's dream.

China Mission is a valuable filmic document which illuminates the life and work of a Canadian who understands and loves a quarter of the world's population.

I have long maintained that Canadian features are like wayward orphans in search of an identity. In contrast, Canadian documentaries are as tough as a pucks and this film is an appropriate example.

Aside to politics, China Mission has never been shown on national television in this country! There are probably many reasons for this, but a few deserve some scrutiny.

Could it be that the traditional rivalry between the NFB and the CBC is depriving Canadians of experiencing this inspired piece of work? Or perhaps the CTV is too interested in American sitcoms to find the time to air a documentary. In any case, it's a national disgrace that this film has yet to be shown on television.

Chester Ronning is an old man. His story may not be slick, sexy or sensational, but it is truly educational. What a wonderful day it would be when our networks could differentiate between the truths of the teacher and the temptations of the titulator.