-Distribution-Now!------

"The import legislation (distribution bill) Flora MacDonald announced is in trouble. If it's backed down and the minister resigns, as I would assume she would, it would be very difficult for the industry. She has announced a major piece of policy and I know her heart is behind it; she's pushing it as hard as she can. If it doesn't go through it would be very difficult for her to remain in that portfolio in any event."

Stephen Roth, June 1987

Without question, distribution legislation is the hottest item on the film agenda this year. Any piece of legislation which, were it to fail in Parliament, could cause the resignation of a minister, dash the hopes distributors have been nursing for more than a decade and toll the final death knell over an independent, Canadian industry, is of considerable note.

The document which follows was received by Cinema Canada at the beginning of November. It was in the form of a photocopy of a typeset document in English. We believe it to be a copy of the distribution legislation as it stands at present. It would appear to be similar to draft copies of the legislation which were circulated in April of this year.

It is now commonly believed that no action will be forthcoming on the legislation until March or April, 1988 when the yes-or-no vote is taken in the U.S. Congress concerning the free-trade agreement. After that vote, regardless of the outcome (and presuming that film and television, as cultural industries, are not included in the agreement), the Canadian government will be free to act on distribution legislation.

Most important in the text which follows is the inclusion of "all media" in 9(b) which essentially opens the entire television market to Canadian distributors, precluding a foreign distributor from handling any film or TV program if the rights are shared by several partners.

It is the belief of Canadian distributors that the passage of legislation like that which follows would assure them of a vital market in Canada and provide, finally, the necessary circumstances for them to become full partners in the film and television industry. Anything short of passage would be a betrayal of all the promises made by the ministers of Communications and Finance, and by the prime minister himself in recent months, say the distributors.

Curtains for Act?

by John Timmins

n Oct. 14, 1987, Michael Wilson stood in the House of Commons during Question Period and, skillfully, neither confirmed nor denied that any new Canadian film distribution policy would be subject to retaliation under a new free-trade agreement with the United States.

It was not as easy for the Finance minister to deflect questions on the following day, but he did. On that day, the opposition had in its hands a briefing paper addressed to James Baker, U.S. secretary and Clayton Yeutter, U.S. trade ambassador.

Under the sub-heading CUL-TURE in upper case letters, the paper, dated mid-Oct., outlined the Canadian position on freetrade in three short paragraphs including " a promise to solve Jack Valenti's problem on film distribution within the next two weeks."

Wilson told Ed Broadbent, (NDP-Oshawa), that there was "no commitment, no understanding to solve Valenti's problem."

He reminded the house that Flora MacDonald, minister of Communications, had made a commitment to "ensure that Canada is treated as a separate market for film distribution."

"That commitment still stands," said Wilson.

Broadbent's reply: "Some of us are inclined to believe something other than that. We are going to look with interest at the Bill the minister has promised to introduce." Repeated efforts to control what is seen on Canadian screens and where box office receipts are spent have gone down to defeat with a succession of Canadian governments. The most recent minister to try wresting control away from the Americans, who consider the Canadian feature film market a domestic market and whose product dominate 96.5 per cent of North American theatrical box office, is Communications Minister Flora MacDonald.

Her fight began in July 1986 when she succeeded Marcel Masse in the Communications portfolio. Masse, some say, was too strong and thus conveniently moved to Mines and Resources where he could be as strong as he wanted to be.

No sooner had MacDonald landed her new job when she inherited the Report of the Film Industry Task Force; Canadian Cinema - a Solid Base, commissioned by Masse in Nov. 1985 around the time the Parti Québécois was abandoning tough distribution legislation in Bill 109 under threat of a Quebec boycott by Jack Valenti's Motion Picture Export Association of America (MPEAA).

Authored by Stephen Roth and Marie-José Raymond and delivered to Masse in Feb. 1986, the report strongly recommended a feature film fund and the Canadianization of the film distribution industry. If Canada were going to foster an indigenous production industry and take more than three per cent of box office, we would have to create an indigenous distribution industry.

It was clear to the authors that the seven U.S. major studios were unsympathetic to "our" problem and self-assured that cinema lay safely within the sacred realm of free-enterprise. Distribution rights, where the Majors were concerned, were non-negotiable.

Several weeks later in April 1986, the Gulf and Western-owned Paramount Pictures, one of the Majors, bought out the Canadian distribution rights of Atlantic Releasing. This effectively cut off Norstar, which had previously held sub-distribution rights from Atlantic Releasing, from many independent U.S. and foreign titles and gaining unrestricted access to the distribution of these titles in Canada.

When Norstar cried unfair
