Love and Hate

The Bayview-Shepherd neighbourhood is tidy, with well-ordered houses gleaming in the sun. Children skip rope and play soccer in a schoolyard. The suburban idyll is jarred by the arrival of a convoy of equipment trucks and vans. A film crew has arrived to recreate reality and to remake it into art for the shooting of Love and Hate. The story of Joan Thatcher is set.

The real-life story of Colin Thatcher, the former Saskatchewan provincial cabinet minister who is now serving a life sentence for the murder of his wife, is being brought to the screen. The filmmaker, Maggie Siggins, has been working with a core group of actors and technicians for months. The film stars Kate Nelligan and Kenneth Welsh. The film is directed by Francis Mankiewicz with a sense of vulnerability. The film is a mini-series called Love and Hate.

When screenwriter Couture first read the book, she barely made it to Christmas dinner because of her reluctance to put the book down. "My reaction was so strong, so visceral, I thought I could get this in the screenplay, this momentum and this tension and this terror for Joan, then I thought I was capturing something important." Couture’s evident concern with the larger issues continued as we spoke in a car parked by the shoot.

"My bias is still for Joan in the sense that I find it heartbreaking that every day I read a newspaper or listen to the news and some woman has been shot dead by a boyfriend because she wanted to leave or was in an unmarriageable marriage and wanted a separation. Let’s not forget that around the same time the whole idea of domestic violence drew boots and calls from the House of Commons. No one gets angry and says this terrible thing happened. I wanted to say look at this. Look at this terrible thing.

For Zukerman it was a fascinating story on many levels. What it said about the justice system. A guy who clearly felt he was above the law and he got away with it for a long time. The civil legal system could not cope with a guy who refused to play by the rules. When you look at all the material in the media, Joan Thatcher was forgotten. Colin was the big name. We’d like to redress that to an extent and also to say something about family violence.

Nelligan is dressed in character in white slacks with a bright, watermelon-coloured sweater. Her hair is styled in a longish pageboy; her makeup is very simple. "I usually take a very documentary approach..." after I read Maggie’s book. I recognized her. She was such a controlled woman by Maggie’s account. I began to be worried about that much control for four hours. I felt that I probably wanted to be more accessible than she would have been to the outside eye. The point is that Maggie didn’t get a chance to see her within the context of the family.

Nelligan continues her reflections on Joan Thatcher. “She’s more ordinary than a lot of women, and I’m very attracted to that. I like that. I don’t think she has an unusual range. I think that ordinariness is fascinating.”

Even the commonplace can elevate itself into fascination. As Zukerman says, “People complain that this is a boring country, but there are wonderful stories here. It’s a complex country. You can go to any part of it and find fabulous stories waiting to be told.”

Roadkill

Today’s the last day of production, the end of a frantic, wild, and intense 15 days of almost non-stop shooting for Bruce McDonald’s first feature film, Roadkill. (And Canada’s first feature-length rock ‘n’ roll movie, Bruce would add.) I can’t remember the last time I had a good sleep, haven’t eaten in three days, and estimate that over the course of production I’ve smoked over 900 cigarettes and consumed about 180 coffees. I’m feeling a little rough. I’m the co-producer and production manager on Roadkill. It’s my job. It’s what I do.

Joey Ramone, myself, and my girlfriend Joanie are crammed into my car and trying to sneak past the Victoria Day parade that is seriously hindering our chances of getting to location on time. A cop who looks just like Burt Reynolds catches us and orders us to stay put. “But we’ve got Joey Ramone in the car”, I try, and for some odd reason the cop lets us through. There was either a break in traffic, or the Ramones are finally releasing mass appeal. We continue our high-speed-chase-style cruise to location, radar detector on and tape-deck full blast, and arrive just in time to see our transportation captain (Evan Siegel) being taken away by the police for unpaid parking tickets.

I follow the cruiser into town and meet them in the station, but when I reach into my pocket to get my money, the whole pocket empties, and onto the floor spills a bundle of fake American twenties, some sort of food substance, a pack of rolling papers, and a very suspicious-looking plastic baggie. I reach down and pick everything up, but as I straighten up I smash my head on the lip of the counter and nearly pass out. I kind of blither away to the cop and explain my way around my personal effects, and he just shakes his head and looks at me in disgust. “I bet you don’t even have any permits, do you?” I sheepishly counter with the snappy and desperate excuse, “My brain is the size of a pea!” Evan and I head back to location, and by the time we get there, everyone’s ready to do the first shot.

Bruce McDonald, D.O.P. Miroslav Bacakz, and camera assistant Lily Tancis are huddled behind the camera, fine-tuning the blocking of the scene with Joey and Joanie. I learn later that Joey was impressed by the fact that Miroslav had a foreign accent, that he thought it really fit in with the kind of shoot we had. Geoff Murrin, the art director, and Valerie Buhagiar, the lead actress, are humming a Ramones song and hard-wiring the fake calculator to my car. Inside the car sits the other actor in the scene, Larry Hudson, sweating like a horse and practicing his lines, as gaffer/grip David Howley adjusts the interior lighting.
Actress Valerie Buhagiar plays Ramona, a character who learns how to drive in Readkill.

Despite our frantic pacing and ragged appearance, we've all pulled through this production with amazing grace. With a commando-sized crew of nine, a stripped-down travelling caravan, a screenwriter on board for the entire 15-day shoot, tough restrictions on spending (absolutely no more than 1.3 donuts per crew member per day, no crullers), and the utmost respect for the schedule, we have miraculously gotten this project done on time and on budget. This is a production built for speed, not comfort, but no one's complaining.

The film pads were smiling down on us for sure. As a matter of fact, the only thing near to a complaint that I can clearly remember was when Bruce and I proudly announced to the crew on day eight that we were actually going to have a day off, and instead of dancing and screaming, they all worried that it might throw off our momentum. Bruce and I worried that the late-night hallucinations the drivers were experiencing were going to catch up to us one way or another. The crew got more excited the day that Geoff accidentally ran over the cache of coffees and sandwiches that Evan had searched Luther Township for hours to find.

The luck and grace that blessed this crew was remarkable. We'd secure a location for free and had to autograph. The kind folks at INCO escorted our tattered and torn, lost little crew from downtown Sudbury to the slag pour site, traded stories about filmmaker Robert Frank (Thrice Ain't No Candy Mountain), and actually rerouted the pour itself to accommodate Bruce and Mirielle's shot. The cast and crew were all encouraged to make script suggestions, and we ended up using a lot of these in the film. It just one-tenth of this production's spirit and energy make it to the screen, we're going to have a great movie. You'll laugh, you'll cry, you'll kiss six bucks goodbye.

Meanwhile, back on set, they've just finished take No. 8 of the Joey and Joanie scene, and Bruce is sure that out of all the footage we've just shot, he'll be able to construct at least one complete and coherent sentence from Joey's dialogue. I get ready to zip Joey back to his hotel downtown, but he wants to hang out and stick around for dinner. We block the next scene in less than 30 minutes. It's the last shot of the shoot, and coincidentally the last shot in the movie. Herwig Garvis, the sound recordist, helps David leased Geoff to the back of the Winnie so he can spread some dust as the Winnie tears through this sleepy town at 80 miles per hour. Valerie makes a brilliant last-minute script suggestion; Don McKellar (the screenwriter) and Bruce refine it, and after one run-through for camera, the scene's in the can. Bruce calls it a wrap; there's much hugging and screaming, and Herwig and Evan set off some firecrackers in the middle of the road. Joey helps us pack away all the gear, and we hop in the vehicles and drive to the local greasy-spoon for some late-night eats.

At the stoplight, a group of punks give us the once-over and admire the Winnipeg's camouflage netting, skulls 'n' crossbones, and mirror-image of the phrase "MOVE OR DIE" painted on the front hood. Don and I take up the rear, and the lead punk leans into our car: "Where are you guys from?" "Hell," I shoot back. "Fuck that," he says, "Need another passenger?"
